The Government had proposed replacing the House of Lords with a mainly elected House of Lords, a policy strongly supported by the Liberal Democrats

This week David Cameron said he would cancel the plans to reform the Lords as he was not able to persuade enough of his backbench MPs to support the timetable motion needed to get the legislation through the House of Commons.

Do you think David Cameron was right or wrong to cancel the plans to introduce an elected House of Lords?

The Government had also proposed cutting the number of MPs from 650 to 600 and redrawing Parliamentary boundaries so that all seats had almost the same electorate, a policy strongly supported by the Conservatives.

In response to cancelling the plans for an elected House of Lords, Nick Clegg has said that Liberal Democrats will vote against the plans to cut the number of MPs and redraw the Parliamentary boundaries.
