A survey by the BBC suggests that the traditional class definitions of working, middle and upper have been replaced by seven new categories, based on their economic capital (their savings, income and home ownership), social capital (who they know and socialise with) and cultural capital (their hobbies and pastimes). Please read the descriptions below, and say which you think you would belong to?

Precariat, or precarious proletariat - the poorest, most deprived class, scoring low for social and cultural capital

Emergent service workers - a new, young, urban group which is relatively poor but has high social and cultural capital

Traditional working class - scores low on all forms of capital, but is not completely deprived. Its members have reasonably high house values, explained by this group having the oldest average age at 66

New affluent workers - a young class group which is socially and culturally active, with middling levels of economic capital

Technical middle class - a small, distinctive new class group which is prosperous but scores low for social and cultural capital. Distinguished by its social isolation and cultural apathy

Established middle class - the second wealthiest, scoring highly on all three capitals. The largest and most gregarious group, scoring second highest for cultural capital

Elite - the most privileged group in the UK, distinct from the other six classes through its wealth. This group has the highest levels of all three capitals

More generally speaking, Which of the following comments best reflects your view?

Managers of football clubs should be appointed purely upon their skills as a football manager and coach, their political views should not be a consideration	34	49	24	37	33	38	28	35
Managers of football clubs are important role models, representatives of their club and public figures - it would not be appropriate for someone with extremist views to hold such a position, regardless of their skills as a manager	41	38	44	40	41	42	49	41
