As you probably know, the Government has proposed reforms to the NHS. These include removing current local NHS Trusts (PCTs) and replacing them with Clinical Commission Groups, groups of GPs that will be responsible for designing local health services in England. The plans also allow these groups to spend money on services from 'any willing provider', including private and voluntary groups, and to bring in a regulator to promote competition in the NHS.

From what you know, how likely, if at all, do you think it is that the reforms will result in...?

Some politicians have argued that the government should withdraw the Health and Social Care Bill as it is growing in complexity and incoherence. The government argues that there is no need to withdraw the Bill and further delay would be damaging to the NHS. Do you think that the Bill should be passed through or withdrawn?

The NHS reforms will remove the Secretary of State's legal duty to provide for healthcare and place this with the NHS Commissioning Board – an independent body which would control the health service's budget

The government has announced reform plans to increase competition. These include increasing the private income cap to 49%, allowing 'any qualified provider' (AQP) to deliver services, and empowering Monitor to create and sustain competition. The Government believes more market competition between providers can drive up quality but say integration and collaboration, where important, will be encouraged as well.

How confident, if at all, are you that the reforms will strike the right balance between promoting more market competition and ensuring integration and collaboration across health care providers?

The Government has compiled a list of all the risks the reforms could pose. These risks have been withheld from the public, including the Lords who are debating the Bill. The Information Commissioner ruled that the risks of the NHS reforms are in the public interest and should be released. The Government says it is not in the public interest as public scrutiny will hinder Government's ability to make decisions and officials may start withholding risks from Government they don't want the public to see.
