Barclays have released notes from telephone calls in the 2008 that some people think suggest that the Bank of England were pressuring Barclays and other banks to lie about their interest rates in order to lower LIBOR and make the banks and the economy look healthier than they really were. The Chancellor, George Osborne, has accused ministers in the last Labour government of being involved in pressuring banks to lie about their interest rates in 2008.

From what you have seen or heard about the story which of the following best reflects your view?

No one told Barclays bank to lie about their interest rates, these are excuses and political point scoring and Barclays probably lied under their own initiative to benefit themselves	33	27	49	22	26	50	33	37	30	34	31	33	36	34	32	33	30	36	35	38

Thinking back to the time of the financial crisis in 2008 when several banks had to be nationalised to prevent them collapsing, do you think it was or was not justified for banks to lie about their interest rates if it avoided an even worse banking crisis?

Under the circumstances of the financial crisis it was justified for banks to lie about the interest rates they were paying

There have been calls for an inquiry into the LIBOR fixing scandal.

Some people have called for a Parliamentary Inquiry, made up of members of the House of Commons and Lords. This would be quicker and cheaper and allow new banking rules to be put into law next year.

Other people have called for an Inquiry led by a Judge, which would be independent of Parliament. This would take longer and be more expensive but could be much wider ranging.

It has also been suggested that Heathrow could increase its capacity by using "mixed mode" flights (this means using both the current runways for both take offs and landings. Currently one runway is used for landings and the other for take-offs, switching halfway through the day). This would allow Heathrow airport to cope with an 60,000 flights a year.
